A Girl's Dream: The Fight Against Child Marriage

In many parts of the world, childhood is a time for school and play. However, for a lot of young girls, childhood ends very early because of child marriage.

Imagine a 13-year-old girl named Amina. She lives in a small village and loves science. She dreams of becoming a doctor. But one day, her parents tell her she is going to marry a man she doesn't know partly because her family don't have enough money to have her at home. Then she must stop going to school. This is a common story in some countries, such as Niger and Nepal.

Child marriage usually means the end of a girl's education. Without that, she cannot find a good job and make enough money. What's more, young brides face serious health dangers if they become mothers before their bodies are ready.

Today, some international groups like UNICEF are working hard to stop child marriage. They believe that every girl has the right to choose her own future. When girls stay in school, they can change their lives and their countries.

Most people go to hospitals to see doctors, but in some hospitals, patients wait to see a different kind of "doctor"—therapy dogs. These special dogs are not there to give medicine; they are there to bring smiles and hope.

One day, while many patients were resting in their beds at City Hospital, a golden retriever named Bella walked into the rooms. She was calmer than another pet and very friendly. Bella’s job was to visit children who felt lonely or afraid.

When Bella visited ten-year-old Leo, he was crying because his leg hurt. However, as soon as he saw Bella, he stopped. He began to pet her soft fur. Doctors say that playing with dogs can help the body feel less pain and more relaxed. It is often easier for children to talk to a dog than to a person.

To become a therapy dog, a dog needs to be very patient. They must learn to stay quiet even when the hospital is noisy. These "four-legged healers" let us know that sometimes, a wagging tail is the best medicine of all.

A Sea of Plastic

Today, plastic pollution is a serious problem in the ocean. Every year, a lot of plastic waste enter the sea. This causes great harm to marine animals.

Many sea animals, such as turtles, whales, and seabirds, cannot tell the difference between food and plastic. 42, a turtle may think a plastic bag is a jellyfish and eat it. However, plastic cannot be digested, so it stays in the animal’s body. As a result, the animal may feel 43 and stop eating real food. Over time, it becomes sick and may die.
